Yes

Please add any comments:

assumption is that more staff will be required, more professionals will visit the school, parents etc. There is a shortage of car parking facilities which need to be addressed for the sanity of staff and residents. many thanks

I believe it would be beneficial for children with autism to start their school life here, instead of having to transition from another school. Some classes have a large number of pupils. One class are spreading out into two classrooms, which is proving to agree with the pupils, which makes me believe smaller class numbers are most beneficial. The school would need more rooms for even more pupils.

Has anyone considered that maybe an ASD school is not ideal for many children with ASD? As a social communication disorder autism makes it difficult to relate to others and to initiate interactions. Putting children; with the same difficulties together further reduces opportunities to gain these skills, children need role models. Additionally, all age schools are not ideal for children with SEND, life is full of change and we need to help children to have successful experiences of this. It really concerns me that by being at one school for their whole education will effectively institutionalise children and make transition to adult services even more difficult than it needs to be.

As long as there is a divide between primary and secondary. Reception pupils will be very vulnerable to our secondary students so there has to be enough space and room types to accommodate everyone.
